Conceit is a blunt fellow who blurts out what he thinks, while modesty is a faker who has acquired a reputation merely by judicious reticence. The state of affairs is unfortunate. If Maurice McLoughlin were to back you in a corner and tell you why he was the greatest tennis player in America you would undoubtedly be hugely interested, but you would feel that you must condemn him for conceit. According to the dictates of modesty, McLoughlin should avoid all mention of his tennis dictates of modesty, McLoughlin should avoid all mention of his tennis.

In Two Leagues

On Friday night he meets Young Abraham Brown at Colonel Reisler's Harlem Sporting Club. This bout ought te settle any doubts as to Saylor's fighting ability, as Mr. Brown is a tough sort of person. If Saylor can win decisively over Brown it will be prost positive that his victory over Cross was not sitogether due to the fact that Leach took on one fight too many.

John the Barber still maintains that Victor Emmanuel Moreno, who has lead to demonstrate this shilly of the same card with Saylor. Phil Bloom, of Brooklyn, has been selected as a subject.

"Vie had stage fright when he met Shamus O'Brien," John declares. "He couldn't get started right that night O'Brien just clung to him the whole evening. You know that O'Brien is a puzzling sort of fighter."

That may be but he did not seem much of a puzzle to Benny Leonard at the same Harlem Sporting Club.
